Name: June Hodge

Major: Art History

Minor: Accounting

Graduating Class: 2021

Current Internship: I am currently working part time at IBM. My main role focuses on cost accrued from IBM's royalty deals. I am also a specialist with IBM's new database, so I work on projects aimed at acclimating co-workers to the new system.

Co-oping at IBM was a phenomenal experience that developed my excel skills and showed me what life after college would look like. After a few days of training I was integrated into a team of skilled financial analysts that worked with me for the duration of the co-op. It was on this team that I projected future forecasts, utilized a multitude of databases, and led team projects. I learned all the necessary skills while on the job which is a testament to their work culture. I was encouraged to take on tasks I had no experience in and to ask questions that challenged the status quo. Overall, it was an astounding opportunity I would recommend to anyone pursuing a career in business.

How has the Boehly Center impacted you?: I would never have found out about the opportunity to work at IBM without the Boehly center. I found out about the opportunity through one of their newsletters.

Accounting firms are no exception as they must adapt to rapid change to better serve client needs. Join William & Mary alumni Hannah Crabtree ('12), Greg Wallig ('94) and Jeff Hughes ('85) as they talk about the many ways data analytics, programming and other emerging technologies are being utilized in the accounting world, from implementing process improvements, automations, and new service offerings to extracting information from financial statements, audit texts and much more. Come prepared to join the conversation and learn more about this fascinating topic.
